Modern solutions to the project management challenges that plague project-centric organizations

The contemporary work environment has experienced the rising demands of customers, partner, and key stakeholders, requiring project-oriented companies to become more proficient in the project and financial management of their project portfolios.

Conventional project management typically encompassed unfledged project management methods, managing offhand projects through unconnected project management applications, and little to no integration with back-office systems like financial, and procurement. The many business drivers that impact the need for an effective project management application include:

- lacking an all-in-one solution that is transparent, judicious, and encourages collaboration.
- the capability to coordinate global projects across multiple geographic locations.
- the agility to make informed decisions via real-time analytics and performance reporting.
- the need for mobility and social interaction across portfolios and projects.
- the need for integration with financial, procurement, and other back-office systems in order to connect projects with strategies and delivering to exceed business objectives.
